

Christine Buzinde, PhD, research focuses on two areas: community development through tourism and the politics of tourism representations. Her work on representations regards tourism texts as cultural repositories through which inclusion/exclusion, North/South and core/periphery can be understood. She examines texts as sites wherein entanglements of power and oppression as well depictions of agency and resistance can be unveiled. Dr. Buzinde's work on development adopts a grassroots approach and it aims to understand the relationship, or lack thereof, between community wellbeing and tourism development within marginalized communities. She conducts research in Tanzania, Mexico, India, Canada and the US. She has published numerous articles in tourism, geographical and cultural studies journals.
